► Abstract

Whilst child welfare systems in the United Kingdom, Australia and the United States may share a number of common goals, they are not designed to identify families with multiple problems. Where system output measures have been utilised as proxy measures to detect such families they indicate the presence of families in the population served by child and family social work. In interviews with practitioners and managers working within contrasting welfare systems, we explore how families with multiple problems are identified, what responses they currently receive and how their needs might be better met.

Keywords: child welfare, child protection, multi problem families, system output measures, international comparisons
